5	I realised today that while some of you do ask questions, the rest seem very hesitant to seek clarifications. Do you have any suggestions on how we could improve this? It is crucial to ask questions—otherwise the pace will get too fast and it would be impossible to follow. Any ideas on how we can do better?

	If something comes up in class which I have not clarified to myself, my default is to look at the textbook and grapple with it on my own, or postpone it and take the theorem on faith - for me, personally grappling with concepts is necessary. I realise
	I tend not to ask questions as I prefer it when I think the problem through on my own and find the answer myself as I remember it for longer rather than when someone else provides the solution.
	I feel like maybe some more time could be given for us to copy down the proofs because simply listening doesn't allow us to understand it fully. Personally, writing down each proof I am able to identify places where it feels handwavy
